In looking over the Catalogue of this admirable institution, we were struck with its peculiar adaptation to the present exigency. At this school the young men have all the scientific education to be had at West Point, with DECISIONS OF THE COURT OF APPEALS a greater scope of scholastic study; and they can be as well litted for military command as for civil pursuits. If the course of study and discipline, as laid down in these regulations, are pursued with the common diligence observed in ordinary colleges, it will furnish a class of men that is now a desideratum to the State, and is the kind of normal school that is wanted; carried on by private enterprise, and supported ; by the public patronage its intrinsic merit is sure to bring to it.

OR, THE IDIDT OF THE ALPS.

BY W. O. EATON.

Far up among the frozen heights of the Alps, their homeward pathway lit, up by the declining sun, a band of hunters were making their perilous descent; now threading, with practheal step, the precipitons defiles which would have be wildered an Lapalled an unaccustomed traveler, and now leaping, with precise and energetic bounds, enormous gorges which yearned between the mountain-sides, and tree. where one careless leap might have sent them instantly to the deep doom below. Yet, faunder with these passes from boyhood, and with eyes and limbs as expert as the chamois which they chased, the hardy peasants made the echoes merry with their laughter; and ever and anon wound their horns, till the music reverberated from a thousand peaks, and, piercing to the valleys below, gave pleasing signal to their expectant families that they

As thus in single file they proceeded, and just as they achieved a long and steep descent, a shout of surprise from the foremost assembled his companions at his side, when they heheld, deeply imbedied in a large snow-drift, the dark figure of a richly-dressed strangerevid ntly not a native of those hills.

Lifting the stranger along over their irregular and still dangerous road, they left the spot, and ere long arrived at the nearest home among the mountains; who e the stranger was provided with refreshments and a couch by the hospitality of the humble occupants; and Som times, with the others separated for their respective dwell-

Sleep and kind care soon restored Andravi, for such was his name, but whether his in firmity of mind was natural, or the result of has fall, the shock and the fright-e-rtain it was that but few words could be elicited from him, and those were not coherent. His mind was wandering and imbecile; and as he could not give any indication as to where his home was, or had been, and was now comparatively helpless, he was suffered to remain among those mountain homes to do what he could learn to do, in return for the affection afforded him; and he soon became widely known among the mountaineers, by the undignified soubriquet of "L. To their joy, he arose at once, and without looking up, as though his mischance were of common occurrence or of no particular importance, they saw him search the snow around him, for the necklace for which he had ventured so much. Soon they saw him stoop, and a faint ejaculation which ascended, intimated that he had found it.

But now the wonder was how he was to ascend again. No path was visible on any hand, and the rope was swinging high beyond the Clasping the chain about his neck, and drawing a knife from his belt, Andravi began to ascend the ragged wall, with the aid of the weapon-entting, as he ascended, step by step, here and there, in ice or earthy crevice, a temporary hold for hand and foot, until, by painfully protracted efforts, which exhibited iron endurance as well as danntless heart, he hal' elevated himself high enough to admit of tving the broken end of the rope around his waist; and from that perilous position, between heaven and earth, he was now cautionsly drawn up, by the overjoyed and amazed party above.

Long were the praises and congratulations which greeted the ldiot, as he stood once more in safety among them; and as he thing himself upon a rock to rest awhile, and held out the necklace with a grim smile, its fair owner refused to receive it.

"No, keep it, as a trophy of your heroism, brave fellow " she cried. "It is valuable; but a poor return for the hazard and labor you underwent, and the wonderful conrage you have shown."

Guiding the travelers safely to their next of the hunters kuelt down, and after a brief point of destination, and receiving other substantial tokens of their admiration, Andravi returned home, where the fame of the exploit soon followed him-an illustration of many similar acts which, during the ten years of his adventurous life among the Alps, made the ldiot's name illustrions among the mountain-

The most remarkable woman of this century was "Harry" Stokes, the bricksetter, who committed suicide in the shuice of the rivor Irwell, at Mode Wheel, England, lately. For about thirty years this extraordinary person lived in Manchester and Salford as a journeyman and master-bricksetter; had been twice married to other women; had kept beer-houses, and served customers at the tap as a "jolly landlord;" had worked at her trade as a brick-setter, and erected many important buildings in both towns, and had obtained the reputation of being the most skillful lire grate setter and "chimney doctor" in the neighborhood. She always dressed as a man, in the elothing peculiar to her trade; invariably superintended the men in her employment; and could lift a weight, spread the mortar, and set a brick with the bost of them. Her habits were those of a man. She attended a daily ordinary in the town along with other bricksetters, drank, smoked, and joked with the hardest, and joinlandlord;" had worked at her trade as a bricked in the evening caronsal.

Yet, with all this constant and close intimacy with the opposite sex, the strong-minded woman contrived to keep her own great secret; and there is every reason to believe that she has gone down into the grave at the The Celebrated New England Remedy advanced age of sixty, or thereabout, having throughout the whole of her remarkable life maintained an unbroken check upon those passions which crowd the streets of every large town with the infortunate of her sex. ller great endeavor was on all occasions to keep up the manly character she had assumed. From a child she had been accustomed to the severe work of one of the most laborious occupations in which man js engaged, and the skill she had attained in the trade roveals an amount of presevering energy which made amount of presevering energy which made her worthy of a better fate than that of the wretched suicide She was the daughter of a bricklayer in a village in the neighborhood of Doneaster. Before she could well balance her own little body she was made "useful" in the house, and ere many years had passed over her head she was brought into acquaintance with some of the roughest and toughest work in those hardwrought days. Little Harriet Stokes' line had not been laid in pleasant places. She was so ground down by the iron hand at home that, when she was about eight years old, she put on a tattered suit of boy's clothing, and walked forth into the "wide, wide world." rive lat the village of Whithy, she looked about for work. She had not run away from her father's house because she did not like work, and peferred to eat the bread of idleness. The hard treatment of parents, ignorant of their responsibility, had driven her from the proteehome. That she was not afraid of hard work was apparent when she offered her services to a brick-setter in Whithy. Though what undersized, she appeared a broad-set, active, useful lad, and was speedily set to Her first efforts to please were attended with success, and she was soon taken as an apprentice. From this point we must drop the feminine appellative and speak of "Harry Stokes" as a boy who has worked his way to the dignity of a journeyman bricksetter. For something hke twenty years from this point we lose the connecting links which join his Yorkshire experience to his Manchester life. About twentyfive years ago he was brought prominently under the notice of the public, by the conse quence of an eccentrie excursion which he had taken into the domains of matrimony. Harry Stokes, wanting a companion in life, executed a matrimonial contretemps. True to his role as a man-for he had reached the age when the average of brick-setters are fathers as well as journeymen-he east about and fixed his choice upon a plump little widow, who kept a Save a large per centage in the beer-house in Unpids-alley, of Deansgate. Manchester. He had been accustomed to take his pot of beer and smoke his short pipe unde Betsy's roof, and had at last taken a decided fancy to Betsy herself,

He was a good-looking young man, was Harry Stokes, for, although still undersized and innocent of whiskers, a face as smooth as a woman's, he was stoutly built, had a capasumed the Governorship of the proposed new gave an unusual profit to his tailor. Hetsy then looked with favor on Harry's suit, for he had the reputation of being a good steady workman, and was doing pretty well as a bricksetter. It was resolved that the twain should become one flesh; and so to the church they hied. Harry discharged the duties of a bridegroom at clurch to perfection; but when the widow got him home there was a terrible row. The night was spent in downright quarrel and fight; and the lamentable result was a summous taken out by Betsy against her husband for an assault, for which he was condemned to the New Bailey for one or two months. During the hearing of the ease, Betsy, with vehemence, declared that her husband was not a man, and that she therefore would not live with him.

The case created great amusement and gossip at the time, and formed the subject of po; ular ballads, which were sung and hawked about the streets of Manchester. "Harry' Stokes, on issuing from the New Bailey, was considerably persecuted by those little gamins, who know so well how to torment street celebrities, while he was also the object of much curious speculation among the brethren of the He, however, maintained a strict silence as to his sex, threw out hints that the woman he had married was mad, and as the most effective proof that she was a maley older his levels of the soon afterward married another widow, rejoicing in the name of Frances Collins, who was some fifteen or twenty years his senior, and had a grown up son and daughter living with her. His connection with this woman, with whom he lived until he committed suicide, is the most mysterious phase of this most mysterious phase of this most mysterious history. She declares with solemn earnestness that she did not know, until informed the other day, that the person with whom she had been living for the last twenty-five years, sleeping together night after night in the same bed, was a woman, and her own children looked upon Stokes as their stepfather.

She asserts that she took Stokes into her house in the first instance out of pity, to shield him from the persecution to which he person to the constructing of the Statutory System of the State. In truth, the work will be found of great value to all elasses of persons.

shield him from the persecution to which he was subjected. It may be that, although out of sense of shame the old woman thus attempts to conceal hor knowledge of Stokes' sex, she did in reality know from the first that the person was a woman, and that she was in all probability induced by Stokes to consent to the union in order that the appearance of married life might dispel the rumors alloat, and enable him to live in "peace and quietness." Whether or not that was the intention, the acquaintance brought about that result; for although there were surmises that "flarry" Stokes was a woman, and he was sep3 wat-wif (W. M. Todd's old stand.) "Harry" Stokes was a woman, and he was constabily the object of curious glances, he Louisville and Frankfort and Lexing-escaped the open molescation to which he had ing and Frankfort Railroads. escaped the open molescation to which he had been previously subjected.
